gation. She began her professional life as an educator, an experience that armed her with a unique perspective on the inner workings of schools and colleges, and the expectations of faculty, administrators and students. Brockington chairs the school and college law section of the Georgia Bar and serves on the board of directors of the labor and employment section of the Atlanta Bar Association. She continues her educator role by mentoring law students and young lawyers in two Inns of Court, teaching trial techniques and regularly lecturing in her areas of expertise.

Like Strickland, Anne Lewis has had a lifelong interest in politics and the legislative process. She serves as chief deputy general counsel of the Georgia Republican Party and as a member of the party's executive and state committees. Lewis' practice includes both challenges to and defense of state and federal legislation such as Georgia's voter ID law and redistricting plans. Lewis represents public utilities before the Public Service Commission, a quasi-political arena, in contested matters and on proposed rulemakings and legislation.

While their individual interests differ, the partners all strongly believe in public service, whether it's as chairman of the board of the Legal Services Corporation, member of the honorary board of directors of Special Olympics Georgia or vice chair of the Supreme Court's Committee on Civil Justice. By combining their individual interests with their careers and remaining true to their commitment to public service, the partners have built a practice they enjoy every day. You can't do better than that.

They say good things come in small packages. Nowhere does that adage ring more true than at Strickland Brockington Lewis, a boutique firm whose partners have found ways to combine their individual outside interests with their legal careers to create an interesting mix.

Senior partner Frank Strickland's passion for the political process and his quiet efforts in building the Georgia Republican Party span 40 years. Strickland draws on his political experiences and relationships when advising clients on governmental and regulatory matters, representing clients on election and redistricting litigation, and acting as special counsel on revenue-bond financing related to the University System.
